

John Sharp Bio

John was diagnosed with advanced prostate cancer on March 14, 2003 at the young age of 49. For over a decade John has lived with the diagnosis of stage IV prostate cancer and experienced several treatments for the disease including: chemotherapy, radiation, hormone therapy, and many others. John has dedicated a great portion of his life to helping others and raising awareness for the disease from his work with Prostate Conditions Education Council to running a local prostate cancer support group held at the University of Colorado.

John has dedicated a great portion of his life to helping others and raising awareness for the disease from his work with Prostate Conditions Education Council to running a local prostate cancer support group held at the University of Colorado Hospital. John understands that when a patient is first diagnosed they are thrown the ultimate curve ball, they are confused as to the next steps and which procedure to do. He shows them the options that are available to them and others in the group who share their experiences. John's mission has always been to help others and he truly enjoys the rewards of such an endeavor.

The Prostate Cancer Torch and Fighting Prostate Cancer One Man At A Time provides an opportunity to bring awareness and education to the disease and challenge the public opinion that prostate cancer occurs only in older men. This program also provides an opportunity for outreach into some of the rural communities in the United States. Join John Sharp as he hits the road spreading awareness.

"What I know now I wish I knew before. Getting checked early can save your life."
